There were so many possible advantages to stalling, Nixon's strategy from the outset, they can't all be catalogued. Some stalling could be expected to create still further delay. An example of this is delaying impeachment proceedings of any kind until they coincided with the trials of those indicted. This would create legal problems of unimagineable proportions.

Could the defendants receive a fair trial amidst all that inevitable publicity?

Could those who were defendants be called as impeachment witnesses?

Suppose impeachment required the defendants as witnesses and they were broadcast by TV? Would this permit fair trial? Would it permit trial at all? Would it lead to reversal after trial and conviction - meaning turning the defendants free?
